Despite a recent spate of media scare stories about the problems caused by Japanese knotweed, organisations and individual homeowners should have nothing to fear provided they take the time to choose a competent and professional treatment specialist.

That's the message from Japanese Knotweed Control (JKC) at this year's SALTEX exhibition as it seeks to redress a number of alarming press reports. SALTEX will also provide a platform for JKC to promote its support for the Invasive Non-Native Specialists Association (INNSA), a new industry body controlling and eradicating invasive non-native species, in which JKC has been closely involved as one of the initial steering group companies.
